

I would like to express my comments in regards to the station K-Love which I enjoy listening to in my area. This station is a unique kind of station--a listener supported station which uses the FM translators to reach a nation-wide audience. As such, they can provide a service to many communities while maintaining a service which can be heard through many states as I travel. They minister to me in a spiritual sense, through the Christian music they provide with little interruption. To replace this type of national service with small local stations (LPFM) would remove a well organized and healthy community service. They have helped many thousands to pick up their lives, and even stop a planned suicide. I don't think a LPFM station in each community could have the resources or manpower to provide such a service in every community. Yes, they might be more 'local', but how many could provide such meaningful and professionally produced content? They certainly have proved that they have a loyal base of followers, by their recently completed pledge drive. I would urge the FCC to not make any changes which would put such a station off of the national coverage that they now have. Thank you.
